Brief write-up explaining why and how you chose "n" for your analysis (for n-grams)

As plot shown above, we counted unique n-grams for each value of n because we think it can help in finding the optimal number of n-grams by providing insights into the diversity and informativeness of the n-grams at different levels.

By examining the number of unique n-grams, we could gain an idea of how diverse the information is. And we observed a rapid increase in the number of unique n-grams as "n" increases, indicating that longer sequences are capturing more diverse information. However, it is important to note that there's always a trade-off between capturing context and avoiding sparsity. Large values of "n" can lead to sparsity issues, especially if the text content is not very large. Too many unique n-grams may result in overfitting, where we might capture noise rather than meaningful patterns. Based on the consideration mentioned, we therefore can pick n value equal to 3 for articles and 2 for Tweets.

Was the "n" identical or different for articles vs. tweets and why?

The n for articles and Tweets are different, and we think it makes much sense because articles typically have more texts/words in their contents, which tend to need more ngrams to capture the diverse information within. On the other hand, tweets are usually short. If we use as many ngram value as we do for articles, the sparsity issue may appear and we wouldn't find patterns in the contents.

For the news articles, please explain why you chose text or title or both text + title combined

We only used text column as our analysis. We observed that text column already combine title information and text information, so there's no need to create another column to combine them.

Also we think some articles may share same titles but have different content, so we think finding pattern only based on articles' titles could be biased.
